1. Duty of confidentiality

A.5.1. Psychologists safeguard the confidentiality of information obtained during their provision of psychological services. Considering their legal and organisational requirements, psychologists:
(a) make provisions for maintaining confidentiality in the collection, recording, accessing, storage, dissemination and disposal of information; and
(b) take reasonable steps to protect the confidentiality of information after they leave a specific work setting or cease to provide psychological services.

1.1. The establishment and maintenance of confidentiality between a psychologist and a client is a fundamental aspect of professional practice, and is considered a cornerstone of the profession. Confidentiality refers to psychologists’ obligations to protect the privacy of clients’ personal information. The assurance of confidentiality helps to establish a relationship of trust (a ‘fiduciary’ relationship) between a psychologist and a client.

1.2. Any response to an enquiry about whether a psychologist is consulting with a client may impact on the client’s confidentiality. A response such as, “I cannot comment either way”, is benign and does not reveal anything about the client.

2. Contractual obligations and confidentiality

2.1. Psychologists are reminded that the Commonwealth Privacy Act (1988), some state Health Records Acts and the Higher Education Support Act (2003) contain legally binding provisions regarding confidentiality of people’s personal information. For example, the Victorian Health Records Act (2001) enunciates the responsibilities for health service providers in the event of the transfer or closure of a practice, or death of the health service provider.

2.2. Psychologists are aware of their contractual obligations to each of the parties involved, particularly when conducting fee-for-service work for third party payers.

3. Informed consent

Refer to the Code, standard A.3. Informed Consent.

A.3.1. Psychologists fully inform clients regarding the psychological services they intend to provide, unless an explicit exception has been agreed upon in advance, or it is not reasonably possible to obtain informed consent.

A.3.2. Psychologists provide information using plain language.

A.3.3. Psychologists ensure consent is informed by:
(a) explaining the nature and purpose of the procedures they intend using;
(b) clarifying the reasonably foreseeable risks, adverse effects, and possible disadvantages of the procedures they intend using;
(c) explaining how information will be collected and recorded;
(d) explaining how, where, and for how long, information will be stored, and who will have access to the stored information;
(e) advising clients that they may participate, may decline to participate, or may withdraw from methods or procedures proposed to them;
(f) explaining to clients what the reasonably foreseeable consequences would be if they decline to participate or withdraw from the proposed procedures;
(g) clarifying the frequency, expected duration, financial and administrative basis of any psychological services that will be provided;
(h) explaining confidentiality and limits to confidentiality (see standard A.5.);
(i) making clear, where necessary, the conditions under which the psychological services may be terminated; and
(j) providing any other relevant information.
3.1. The process of informed consent includes clarifying for the client or his/her representative, the nature of the provision of psychological services, and the extent of potential disclosure of the client’s information. Refer also to Section 4 “Limits to confidentiality”.

3.2. As part of the informed consent process, psychologists explain to their clients the limits to confidentiality. It is preferable to obtain written consent from a client that indicates what personal information may be released, under what circumstances, and to whom it may be disclosed. When working with involuntary clients, psychologists are particularly mindful of the need to clarify the above issues.

A.3.6. Psychologists who work with clients whose capacity to give consent is, or may be, impaired or limited, obtain the consent of people with legal authority to act on behalf of the client, and attempt to obtain the client’s consent as far as practically possible.

A.3.7. Psychologists who work with clients whose consent is not required by law still comply, as far as practically possible, with the processes described in A.3.1., A.3.2., and A.3.3.

3.3. When working with clients who are young people, psychologists determine the capacity of the client to provide informed consent. A young person is considered capable of giving informed consent when he or she “achieves a sufficient understanding and intelligence to enable him or her to understand fully what is proposed” (Secretary, Department of Health and Community Services v JWB and SMB, (1992) FLC 92-293, at page 79,174). The process of deciding if a young person can provide informed consent includes assessing whether he or she:

- can understand the nature of the proposed psychological service;
- can understand the benefits and risks of the proposed psychological service;
- can understand the consequences of receiving or not receiving the proposed psychological service;
- has the capacity to make an informed choice; and
- can understand the limits to confidentiality.

A.3.8. Psychologists who work with clients whose capacity to provide informed consent is limited, obtain the consent of people with legal authority to act on behalf of the client, and attempt to obtain the client’s consent as far as practically possible.

3.4. In circumstances where a third party is paying for the provision of a psychological service and the client provides consent for the disclosure of their personal information to that third party, psychologists review the scope of the consent form and the date when the consent was provided. Psychologists establish that the consent provided was specific for the information to be disclosed, and was reasonably contemporaneous with the request for information.

A.3.9. Psychologists who work with clients whose consent is not required by law still comply, as far as practically possible, with the processes described in A.3.1., A.3.2., A.3.3., and A.3.8.

4. Limits to confidentiality

Refer to the Code, standard A.5. Confidentiality.

A.5.2. Psychologists disclose confidential information obtained in the course of their provision of psychological services only under any one or more of the following circumstances:

(a) with the consent of the client or a person with legal authority to act on behalf of the client;
(b) where there is a legal obligation to do so;
(c) if there is an immediate and specified risk of harm to an identifiable person or persons that can be averted only by disclosing information; or
(d) when consulting colleagues, or in the course of supervision or professional training, provided the psychologist:
   (i) conceals the identity of clients and associated parties involved; or
   (ii) obtains the client’s consent, and gives prior notice to the recipients of the information that they are required to preserve the client’s privacy, and obtains an undertaking from the recipients of the information that they will preserve the client’s privacy.
4.1. Confidentiality is not absolute. There may be occasions when the provision of a psychological service to clients may require that information to be shared among relevant others including professionals and family members, such as gathering an informant history for a neuropsychological assessment, or giving feedback to next of kin. Such arrangements are conveyed and explained to clients.

4.2. Young people.
At the outset of working with young people as clients, psychologists clarify the limits to confidentiality with all relevant parties, including parents when they are involved in the consent process.

4.3. Organisational settings.
Clients of agencies, businesses, schools, hospitals, employee assistance programs, or other organisations need to be informed from the outset about how their personal information may be used and disclosed to others. Where psychologists' conditions of employment require disclosure of client information, they clarify these matters with clients at the outset. For example, in the context of correctional services, issues of safety and security may require the disclosure of client information within the organisation. In the context of hospitals and health-care settings, it is common to have a team approach to client treatment which may require sharing of client information.

4.4. When psychologists are legally obliged to disclose client information.

Refer to the Code, standard B.1.Competence.

B.1.2. Psychologists only provide psychological services within the boundaries of their professional competence. This includes, but is not restricted to:

…
(d) complying with the law of the jurisdiction in which they provide psychological services.

…

4.4.1. There are some situations where psychologists are legally required to disclose information obtained from clients. For example, some states in Australia mandate psychologists to report child abuse and neglect. Psychologists need to be mindful of the legal requirements of their workplace setting, such as reports to Medicare, court directed reports, and the monitoring of conditions of parole. For example, psychologists in the Department of Defence are required to report information that affects the security of the country.

4.4.2. Psychologists may receive a subpoena which compels them to attend court and/or provide client records to the court. It is possible to seek to vary a subpoena, but this should be done in consultation with the court (Davidson, 2002). Legal advice may assist psychologists in responding to a subpoena.

Refer to Guidelines on reporting child abuse and neglect, and criminal activity (2001).

4.5. When psychologists are legally allowed to disclose client information, but not compelled.

Refer to the Code, standard A.5. Confidentiality.

A.5.4. When a standard of this Code allows psychologists to disclose information obtained in the course of the provision of psychological services, they disclose only that information which is necessary to achieve the purpose of the disclosure, and then only to people required to have that information.

4.5.1. In such situations psychologists make a professional judgement about whether to disclose client information or not – refer to standard A.5.2. This judgement frequently involves the determination of risk, harm or danger to the client or to others, which is sometimes referred to as the duty to warn or the duty to protect or care for the client and for others. Dilemmas emerge when the need to maintain confidentiality competes with the duty to warn or to protect others. Part of the difficulty is associated with the definition and extent of risk or harm and hence who ought to be protected. Some of the issues that need to be considered when making a professional judgement are presented in Section 5 of the Guidelines for working with people who pose a high risk of harming others (2005).
4.5.2. Where safety permits, psychologists inform clients:
(i) if their information is to be disclosed;
(ii) about what information is to be disclosed;
(iii) of the circumstances and the reasons for the intended disclosure of information; and
(iv) to whom and when the disclosure is to be made.

4.5.3. When psychologists choose to disclose client information, a decision needs to be made about who will be informed. For example, with suicidal clients – options might include at a professional level: GP, Crisis and Assessment Treatment team, or police; and for personal support: the client's parents, partner or close friend.

Refer to Guidelines relating to suicidal clients (2004).

Refer to the Code, standard A.5.Confidentiality.

A.5.3. Psychologists inform clients at the outset of the professional relationship, and as regularly thereafter as is reasonably necessary, of the:
(a) limits to confidentiality; and
(b) foreseeable uses of the information generated in the course of the relationship.

4.5.4. If communication of client information between professionals is essential for client welfare or services, then the client needs to be advised in advance of the limits to confidentiality that have been established between the professionals.

4.5.5. Minimal confidential information may also be disclosed if a psychologist's interests require disclosure, for example in pursuit of a bad debt, in defence of a psychologists' registration board hearing, or a legal action taken by a client.

5. Confidentiality of records

Refer to the Code, standard A.5. Confidentiality.

A.5.1. Psychologists safeguard the confidentiality of information obtained during their provision of psychological services. Considering their legal and organisational requirements, psychologists:
(a) make provisions for maintaining confidentiality in the collection, recording, accessing, storage, dissemination, and disposal of information; and
(b) take reasonable steps to protect the confidentiality of information after they leave a specific work setting, or cease to provide psychological services.

5.1. Psychologists ensure their record-keeping, information and communication systems are adequate to maintain client confidentiality both during and after the professional relationship. These communication systems may include messages, emails, diary entries, and appointment arrangements.

5.2. Psychologists are responsible for the management of the confidentiality of their client files in the event that they choose to cease practising or transfer their psychology practice.

5.3. Psychologists are responsible for planning for the management of the confidentiality of their client files after their death. This is known as a professional will.

Refer to Guidelines on record keeping (2004).

Refer to the Code, standard B.6. Delegation of professional tasks.

B.6. Psychologists who delegate tasks to assistants, employees, junior colleagues or supervisees that involve the provision of psychological services:
(a) take reasonable steps to ensure that delegates are aware of the provisions of this Code relevant to the delegated professional task.
5.4. Psychologists are responsible for ensuring the security and management of confidential files by staff whom they supervise in the workplace.

5.5. Psychologists are alert to inappropriate requests for client records made by other professionals, and they decline to comply if doing so would be a breach of confidentiality.

6. Summary

6.1. While confidentiality is a cornerstone of psychological practice, it is not absolute. It is important that clients are informed of the limits to confidentiality through the informed consent process.

6.2. Psychologists need to understand the legal context in which they work and be cognisant of relevant organisational requirements.

7. References

Secretary, Department of Health and Community Services v JWB and SMB (“Marion’s case”) (1992) 175 CLR 218. Secretary, Department of Health and Community Services v JWB and SMB (1992) FLC 92-293.

8. Further reading

Revised version approved by the APS Board of Directors, December 2007